

Carol Everett asks for more research into her healing 'breakthrough'

For the past four years, medium and healer Carol Everett has been working on a new type of healing – through the blood. She believes the blood holds a memory, and by directing her intense healing energies into a small amount of blood, has found that this process raises its frequency and boosts immunity. Then, by putting some of these healed blood cells back into the body via acupuncture or injection by a doctor, they meet with the other blood cells and pass on the healing memory. This starts to re-programme the blood and boost the entire immune system.

Carol has recently carried out a case study on this method remotely, from Spain to South Africa, working in conjunction with a doctor who does not want to be named, and a live blood analysis expert who is happy to talk about the blood changes.

After only three remote blood healings, they apparently found a marked difference in the patients' blood.

This new method of healing which Carol is carrying out is a pioneering experiment and has never been done before. When she was tested at Denki University in Japan in 1994, the professor said Carol's abilities were on a very high level, but that they did not have anything against which to measure them.

Researchers have said that Carol's abilities are ahead of their time. The Japanese professor has said recently that he has not come across anyone changing the blood as Carol does.

Giving her own view of the tests and results, Carol told PN that since her 1994 tests in Tokyo, her abilities had undergone more testing, not in such a scientific way, but enough to prove that her remote healing is stronger after fifteen years of perfecting her own method of visualisation, breathing techniques and working closely with the higher energies that influence her work.

CAROL EVERETT: "This is an exciting breakthrough because it shows that remote healing can and does work."

"Recent examples are trials of remote healing from Spain to Cape Town," she said.

"This is an exciting breakthrough because it shows that remote healing can and does work, and can be measured by blood analysis. Experts have tested samples which have been worked on by distance healing.

"Patients offer to take part in these trials, which are monitored at a clinic by an internationally recognised blood analyst. Initially I said I hadn't done it before, and did not know whether it would work.

"On twelve separate occasions a small amount of blood was taken from the patient and put into two phials. I focused on one for 20 minutes, and one was left as a control sample. The phial that I worked on had totally changed.

"A small sample of healed blood was injected back into the patient by a doctor who does not wish to be named. This can also be done by an acupuncturist by pricking meridian points with healed blood on the needles.

"All this was supervised by Nola Davidson, a qualified blood analyst of the Syringa Health and Therapeutic Centre in Cape Town. Her testimonial can be read.

"What happens is that the immune system starts to work overtime on the healed blood. This then passes the message to the rest of the blood. There are other communications going on in the body that cannot be fully understood, but the result is that weeks afterwards, the patient's blood results are continuing to be much improved. The process continues, and the ability to fight illness is greatly increased."

The above blood slides were taken on 12th November 2009 – two weeks after the fifth session. The report describes the results as "more or less the same as interim slide i.e. – milieu still 'clean'; not much debris; few fungal deposits; some target cells; most white blood cells active; some slightly irregular and 'sticky' red blood cells but have not formed rouleaux... Overall it was observed that the immune system became healthier; red blood cells still in the process of healing."

Further tests were conducted earlier this year. The above blood slides above were taken on 11th January 2010. The left-hand slide was taken before healing, and the report describes the condition of the blood as: "Evidence of rouleaux. Some target cells indicating sluggish liver. A few fungal residues. Both red and white blood cells robust. No extra-cellular debris."

The right-hand slide was taken after healing, and described as: "Fewer rouleaux (not as sticky). Very few fungals. Not as many noticeable target cells. White blood cells active. No debris."

The final outcome of the tests was that the immune system – which would normally take months to reach the raised state – did so after three weeks.

The second trial, carried out at a later date, showed that the blood quality had remained up by comparison with the previous time. After testing following the second trial, the quality had continued to improve and was even better.

Carol believes that the immune system should be improved to cope with illness, and that giving the body too much medication weakens the immune system.

"This is still early stages, but it is a breakthrough that needs to be followed through and researched," says Carol.

"This information has been passed to Japanese producers, and hopefully, further trials will take place. If not, I will continue to gather evidence and testimonials to support this pioneering method.

"Meanwhile, I am happy that my remote healing is getting stronger, making healing more accessible to people who cannot travel, while being a pioneer for others to eventually follow.

"After the report from South Africa, I am slowly introducing this new method to clients. There are only a few people so far who have had the opportunity to have this healing, now being done in conjunction with acupuncturists who believe in my work.

"They have seen enough results from it to become very interested in following it through and collecting case histories."

In a letter to Carol Everett, Nola Davidson, blood analyst at the Syringa Therapeutic Centre, Cape Town, said, "I was an independent observer of the progress of Julie C's live blood microscopy sessions over a period of five weeks during October and November 2009.

"Although Julie had been doing detoxification and cleansing programmes over the past few months, I feel that the pace at which the blood changed during that five-week period was marked, and that the 'cleansing' and 'programming' of the blood that you carried out remotely from Spain, accelerated the process, indicating an improvement in the immune system.

"For example, I usually only expect changes in red blood cells after about five to six weeks, so was surprised to see the number of good quality cells displaying after only three weeks.

"Overall, I would say that many patients would only show a significant improvement in the quality of their blood after around six months of embarking on a cleansing programme."
